Renee Doucette, GoLocalProv Art Critic

As September ends, exhaustion may threaten to set in since it has been openings, open studios, and events for the past month in addition to getting back into the swing of fall. Perhaps many will welcome the lighter schedule, but some might feel like something is missing with having so much free time as October rolls around. Fear not because there are still some exciting things in store for October other than worrying about Halloween costumes.

“Serena Perrone: Volcanoes and Voyages” Until October 29

Cade Tompkins Projects

If you have not been to Tompkins' gallery space on the East Side of Providence, now is a perfect time to venture out there. Tompkins' current exhibition features the work of Serena Perrone. Perrone cannot be categorized as just one type of artist when it is clear from the exhibit how many mediums she has mastered at such a young age since she just reached her thirties. Several bodies of work in this show work together cohesively and show Perrone's amazing range and exquisite talent. Tompkins always takes the time to curate each show masterfully and one should expect nothing less from this presentation. Word to the wise: the only signifier for this gallery is the gold sun doorknocker on a dark door and the correct doorbell to ring in order to be let in if the door is locked is on the left.
